Notes from the Executive Director

Astronauts cannot afford to make a mistake. Alone, isolated, millions of miles from their home base, they have to rely on training to get them through crisis situations. To ensure their instincts are keen and that they will respond flawlessly under extreme pressure, the astronaut spends hundreds of hours in flight simulators. For the same reasons, the armed forces put military pilots through fighter and bomber simulations. They test the candidates under typical as well as extraordinary situations to evaluate their responses.

Public safety trainers have learned to use simulators in the same manner and for the same reasons as our military counterparts. Judgement shooting simulators immerse students in the scenario-based confrontations to train and test them on how to identify and evaluate a potential threat, and when to resort to deadly force. Driving simulators were originally designed to train officers in emergency vehicle operating skills. More recently, they have been used to test the students' ability to judge when to engage or disengage in vehicle pursuits.

Not satisfied with these practical applications, Patrick Gallagher, a noted lecturer on police liability, recently challenged public safety trainers to expand the applications of simulation training.

"We should move on," Gallagher said, "from 'shoot, don't shoot' and 'chase, don't chase' to 'arrest, don't arrest', 'strike, don't strike' and 'search, don't search'."

The whole purpose of simulation training, whether for space flight, military or public safety, is to provide a safe environment in which the student can experience the situation we wish to train and test. If we are successful, the first time the officer finds him or her self in the situation in real life, they will have the simulation training to fall back on. Officers can avoid the "Now what do I do?" quandary if we have exposed them to the same or a similar experience in simulation.

While I agree with Gallagher's challenge to expand simulation training, I believe he has not touched on the single most important and most ignored application... integrity. What choices or decisions do we want officers to make when, all alone, miles from supervision, they are confronted with temptation, intimidation, enticement and peer pressure. Hour upon hour of lecture on dignity, honesty and character isn't enough. We need to place trainees in the simulation scenario that challenge their personal integrity, and then ask them "Alright, what are you going to do... and why?" Here we can provide the appropriate reinforcement and corrections. Here is our best opportunity to hone the officer's instinctive response to do the right thing. Here also we gain insight as to how the officers regard themselves, their agency and their profession. Wrong answers may simply be an inaccurate perception of what behavior is expected. More than one prosecutor has complained about police officers who seem to believe they are expected to say anything to get a conviction.

Notes from the Executive Director

Integrity simulations achieve a number of other, more subtle goals. For some officer-students, perhaps for the first time, simulations can surface the manner in which their sense of right and wrong will be challenged and potentially compromised on the job. If not alert to these dangers, the officers may find themselves making bad decisions before they even realize what they have done. As one correctional officer observed, "I never thought rounding my time sheet off to the next hour was actually fraud."

Simulation training in operational areas, particularly critical skills like firearms, is absolutely essential for law enforcement and correctional officers. But just as essential are the simulations which train these men and women on the correct choices to make in the area of personal integrity. Failing to provide this training ill serves the officer and the agency. Both are likely to incur the regrettable result of a bad decision.... a result that could have been avoided with a little practice.

D.A.R.E. UPDATE

MARYLAND D.A.R.E. GOES ON THE WEB !!

The Maryland D.A.R.E. Office has entered the cyber-world of the Internet. This month the first phase of the Maryland D.A.R.E. Web Page was opened.

The site can easily be accessed through the Department of Public Safety's web site at www.dpscs.state.md.us and then clicking on the D.A.R.E. logo.

The page offers information about the State-wide prevention program for officers, educators, parents and children. There are links to sites that provide drug information and statistical information in addition to information specific to the D.A.R.E. Program.

The site can easily be accessed through the Department of Public Safety's web site at dpscs.state.md.us and then clicking on the D.A.R.E. logo.

Please take a look and feel free to let us know what you think.

D.A.R.E. Vehicles on web site

This Pearl White Patrol Unit was retired from the Laurel Police Department and was scheduled for sale. It was taken to Fox Chevrolet of Laurel and rebuilt. The entire vehicle excluding the body was rebuilt. The car is powered by an LT-1 Corvette Engine and sports racing wheels and tires and a NASCAR Suspension. Fox Chevrolet donated all the parts and labor. This car still prowls the streets of Laurel while it promotes the D.A.R.E. Program.

SECRET SERVICE AVAILABLE IN CHILD ABUSE INVESTIGATIONS

The United States Secret Service has informed us of their availability to provide forensic assistance to local police departments in child abuse investigations. Specifically, the Service can perform polygraph exams, questionable document examinations, fingerprint identification and graphic arts support.

In addition to operational support, this information may be included in training courses which detail external services available to police investigators. (See Police Training Objective 320 and others.) U.S. Secret Service will provide forensic support in investigations involving missing, abused, and murdered children.

Polygraph Exams

Of the 35 polygraph examinations involving abused and/or murdered children conducted for state and local law enforcement during the last two years, 24 subjects were found to be deceptive. Of these, 20 confessed to the allegations of sexual/physical abuse or murder, including victims of the shaken baby syndrome. Service polygraphers are graduates of the Department of Defense Polygraph Institute and have received advanced training in conducting exams in these types of investigations.

Questioned Document Examinations

The Secret Service can conduct handwriting comparisons, as well as printer identifications on documents produced on many office machine color copiers. They can utilize their forensic expertise with inks to resolve source and age determination issues. In a recent investigation, service chemists determined that entries in the diary of an abused child were made at the time of the abuse, not years later as the defense alleged. They have also successfully recovered indented writing (i.e., indentations on paper created when someone writes something on a preceding sheet of paper), as well as obliterated writing, on pedophile documents.

Fingerprint Identification

The Agency has decades of experience developing latent prints using ninhydrin, physical developer, forensic light sources (e.g., laser), and fluorescent and chemical powders. They recently purchased a state-of-the-art Vacuum Metal Deposition unit that does an outstanding job of developing latent fingerprints on semi and non-porous surfaces (e.g., plastic, metal, tape, leather, vinyl, etc.). Use of a first generation unit allowed for development of fingerprints previously undetected by standard techniques on a plastic garbage bag and a leather wallet recovered in two homicide investigations. The Service also has built a large network that allows us to electronically submit unidentified latent prints to 25 state and local AFIS databases.

Graphic Arts Support

Service graphic artists can provide suspect drawings, age progression, and crime scene recreations. Forensic specialists can enhance video and audio tapes.

You can request forensic assistance by contacting your local U.S. Secret Service Office.

Telephone numbers are listed in the front of every phone directory, as well as on the Service's Home Page on the Internet (www.tres.gov/uss).

LOCKUP USA: Vol. 7 Iss. 7 - Controlling Perimeter Security

VHS

The purpose of this video and training guide is to stress the importance of perimeter security as it pertains to the operation as a whole. To maintain the highest level of security in any institution, the perimeter must be safe from any threat that could disrupt the operation of the facility. This would include the smuggling in of contraband by inmates and visitors, or the threat of escape by inmates due to lax perimeter security and this program looks at a number of inmate workers, correct security measures during delivery of goods from the outside, and the screening of professional visitors.
