Inspections: Training's Partner

Nearly all courses on public safety administration will point out that written policy statements and/or procedural directives are not sufficient to ensure employee compliance or operational efficiency. In support of policy there must be training, inspection and reinforcement.

We are all familiar with the purpose of training and the various strategies for instruction. But when the class is concluded and the students have returned to their regular assignments, how can we be sure that the training took root? How do we determine if the training was worthwhile? The answer is INSPECTION.

Different from testing or other classroom-based assessment of comprehension, inspection is conducted at the worksite. Inspectors review how the student is performing the subject task and whether there has been added efficiency or effectiveness as a result of the training experience. If the report is positive the training may be suitable for other employees performing the same function. If the on-site review produces negative results some correction in the content of the training and/or the instructional strategy is necessary. It could be that training was not the appropriate tactic at all. Without follow-up inspection there is no way to determine if the investments in curriculum development, delivery and class attendance was worthwhile.

Inspection of training should be conducted at a minimum of two levels; the student/subject of the training and the supervisor of that person. The person who attended the training may be in the best position to report whether the knowledge, skills and abilities conveyed through the instructional program actually enhanced their capacity to perform, or was a waste of time, effort and energy. However, the employee's perspective on performance expectations may vary from those of their supervisor. The supervisor should also assess the benefits of the employee's training. The administrative or managerial level can also provide good feedback information on post-training performance if they are positioned close enough to the operation to make legitimate evaluations.

Very often the training event is preceded by a "training needs analysis." This is a formal or informal review of the operation of the unit or an individual's performance to assist in determining what training is most appropriate. The training needs analysis ("What's wrong and what role does training have in correcting the problem?") provides an excellent rubric for post-training inspection.

- Has the problem been corrected?
- Is there a direct connection between the training received and the reduction/elimination of the problem?
- Are there still associated or subordinate issues that can be addressed through training?

The answers to these and similar questions will provide a better guide to determining the real value and effectiveness of the training program. Additionally, they set the groundwork for the next training session.

The role of the inspector is critical to the training process. In the best of cases the inspector is also an experienced instructor just as veteran inspectors can be outstanding instructors. For trainers, also being an inspector and able to see the fruits of training applied brings fulfillment to the labors they put into lesson plan development, test writing, etc. Inspectors who are familiar with the utility as well as the limitations of training are better able to determine if training is a viable solution to work place problems.

Together, training and inspections can be effective.

THE ADVANCED AND SPECIALIZED TRAINING UNIT

by Glen Plutschak, Administrator

The Advanced and Specialized Training (AST) Unit recently coordinated a regional crime prevention initiative patterned after Collaborative Supervision and Focused Enforcement (CSAFE). Members of the Heightened Enforcement Accountability and Treatment (HEAT) team in the Elkton CSAFE area are now working collaboratively with their law enforcement and parole and probation counterparts in Delaware to deal with offenders who move freely across the Maryland/Delaware border.

The staff of AST is also wrapping up 2005 by offering two regional CSAFE summits. The summits feature keynote speaker, Dr. Marilyn Van Dietsen who will provide participants with resources for dealing with at-risk offenders. She will focus on what works strategies as well as providing tools for preventing recidivism. Mr. Tom Carr from HIDTA will demonstrate a regional gang intelligence database to track gangs in Maryland. In addition to the speakers, participants will have a chance to engage in small group activities. As always, the summits are expected to provide CSAFE HEAT team members with an opportunity to network with their counterparts from across the state.

The staff of AST will offer a final in-service training program to wrap up a successful training year. The training, "Witness Intimidation: Did You See What I Saw," offers information about gang and drug violence across the state. Attendees at this training will view direct examples of gang and drug violence in the state while also receiving current information about the prevalence of witness intimidation in Maryland.

Our staff looks forward to offering CSAFE, in-service, and Neighborhood Safety Team (NST) training in 2006. We are already planning a spring CSAFE academy, fall NST, forum, and winter summits. This training will be interspersed with in-service training, on-the-job training, HATS training, and technical assistance throughout the year. We will start with a focus on sex offenders in early 2006.

AST remains committed to saving trees; therefore, all editions of Promising Partnerships are available at <http://www.mdle.net/astnewsletter.htm>

EXECUTIVE DEVELOPMENT INSTITUTE UPDATE

Maryland Police and Correctional Training Commissions

LEOBR. After an alleged unauthorized vehicular pursuit by one of its police officers, the Maryland-National Capital Park and Planning Commission brought disciplinary proceedings against the officer under the Law Enforcement Officers Bill of Rights (Public Safety Art., §3-101 et seq.) (LEOBR). The LEOBR administrative hearing board found the officer not guilty. The Commission petitioned the circuit court for judicial review, but the circuit court ruled the Commission was not entitled to judicial review. The Commission appealed.

In this case of first impression, the Court of Special Appeals held that a police department is not entitled to judicial review of a not-guilty finding rendered by a hearing board under the LEOBR. The LEOBR states that a not-guilty finding terminates the action. The intent of the LEOBR is to protect officers, and the Court interpreted the LEOBR as providing for judicial review only when a board's decision is unfavorable to an officer. The Court was careful to point out it relied on administrative law, not criminal double jeopardy rules, to interpret the LEOBR. Maryland-National Capital Park and Planning Commission v. Anderson, __Md.App.__ (2005).*

Terry frisk of automobile.

A citizen approached a police officer in a 7-11 and said he just saw a high-speed chase where one of the cars' occupants displayed a handgun out the window. The citizen pointed out the car in the parking lot, and said the man who waved the gun was on the payphone outside the store. Police watched the man on the phone (Elohim Cross). The police believed Cross was trying to avoid them by remaining on the pay phone, so they drove off and returned on foot. Cross walked to his car, where he was handcuffed and patted down for weapons. Police explained to Cross that he was being detained because of the citizen's firearm report. One officer said he saw a gun in the glove box through a crack in the top; the box was locked so police got a key from Cross. A gun and a large quantity of drugs were found in the glove box, and Cross was arrested. Cross argued the gun and drugs should be suppressed because there was no probable cause for the warrantless search of his car or his arrest. The trial court disagreed; Cross was convicted.

The Court of Special Appeals followed Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032 (1983), and held that Cross was not subject to a full-blown arrest, and the protective search of Cross's car for weapons was permissible under Terry. Based on the citizen's in-person account and identification of Cross, police had reasonable articulable suspicion that Cross had a gun on his person or in the car. The Court pointed out that police explained to Cross why he was detained, the detention was brief, and Cross was not transported to another location - significant factors in determining the reasonableness of the detention. The limited 'frisk' of the automobile for weapons did not violate the 4th Amendment. Cross v. State, __Md.App.__ (2005).*

Medical use of marijuana.

Correctional officers found marijuana on inmate Paul Miles Jefferson, Jr., and he was charged with possession of marijuana, a Schedule I controlled dangerous substance. Jefferson moved to dismiss the charge, arguing that by enacting the "Compassionate Use Act," the legislature recognized marijuana has valid medical functions and should have been re-scheduled in light of that legislative recognition. The court rejected this argument. Jefferson was found guilty, and appealed.

Jefferson made the same argument on appeal and pointed out Schedule I drugs are categorized as such because of their high potential for abuse and lack of accepted medical use or safety for use in medically supervised treatment. The Compassionate Use Act was passed by the General Assembly in 2003, and provides for decreased penalty in a marijuana possession case if a court finds the defendant used or possessed marijuana because of medical necessity (Crim. Law Art., §5-601(c)). The Court of Special Appeals did not believe the General Assembly decided marijuana has a recognized medical use and should be removed from Schedule I. The Compassionate Use Act simply permits a court to consider medical necessity as mitigating evidence in a marijuana possession case. The possession or use of marijuana - even in event of a medical necessity - remains illegal. Jefferson v. State, __Md.App.__ (2005).*

Miranda - two-step interrogation. The Court of Special Appeals has again cautioned police against using 2-step interrogations. Police placed murder suspect Brian Cooper in custody and questioned him first without giving him the Miranda warnings; Cooper made no incriminating statements. Then police set up audio recording equipment and mirandized Cooper before taking his taped statement. During this second statement, Cooper made incriminating statements which the State introduced at trial. The interrogating officer testified at trial that he did not give Cooper the Miranda warnings before the first questioning because he did not want him to ask for a lawyer. The trial court ruled the second statement did not violate Cooper's rights because he made no self-incriminating statements during the first interrogation. Cooper was convicted.

The Court of Special Appeals applied Missouri v. Seibert, 542 U.S. 600 (2004), and reversed Cooper's conviction. Seibert involved a two-step interrogation process where a suspect was questioned until she confessed, then about 20 minutes later was mirandized and asked the same questions again until she repeated the confession. The Supreme Court held that if police use a deliberate two-step strategy, postwarning statements related to the substance of prewarning statements must be excluded unless curative measures (e.g., a substantial break in time) are taken before the postwarning statement is made. Here, Cooper's second interrogation was practically an extension of the first, and police admitted they handled the interrogation this way so he would not ask for a lawyer. Cooper's postwarning statement therefore violated Miranda and should not have been admitted at trial. Cooper v. State, __Md.App.__ (2005).*

Sex Offender Registry - homeless persons.

James William Jeandell was convicted of rape, and upon release from prison was required to register with Maryland's Sex Offender Registry and to send written notice to the Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services (DPSCS) within 7 days of any change in his residence. Jeandell became homeless after neighbors complained to his landlord about his presence in the neighborhood, and he failed to notify DPSCS of his whereabouts. Jeandell was charged and found guilty of violating the sex offender registration law (Crim Proc. Art., §11-721).

On appeal, Jeandell argued that because he was homeless he could not comply with the notification requirements. The Court of Special Appeals affirmed his conviction, noting that the law simply requires the registrant to give DPSCS written notice within 7 days when there has been a change in the place he was living. The Court held that "[e]ven a homeless person lives someplace," and Jeandell can still comply with the registration requirement by keeping DPSCS informed of his whereabouts each time they change. Jeandell v. State, __Md.App.__ (2005).*

Computer sex crime. Richard Joseph Moore communicated online with a person he believed was a 14-year-old girl in order to arrange a sexual encounter. The 'girl' was actually an undercover police officer. Moore was arrested when he arrived at the meeting site and convicted of child pornography (Crim. Proc. Art., §11-207). On appeal, Moore argued the statute criminalizing use of a computer for soliciting a minor for sex covers only communication with an actual minor. The Court of Special Appeals agreed. By defining "minor" in Maryland's criminal laws as someone under 18 years of age, and using that term in the child computer pornography laws, the Court concluded that the legislature intended to cover only interaction with an actual person under 18 years old. The Court noted that several unsuccessful attempts have been made in the General Assembly to broaden this law to include communicating with an adult who the defendant believes is a minor. Moore v. State, __Md.App.__ (2005).*

Confessions - police deception. Leroy Lincoln, Jr. was arrested for conspiring with his mother and friends to kill his father for insurance money. Lincoln waived his Miranda rights, and then a detective interrogated him for about 1 ½ hours. Lincoln initially denied involvement in the crime. The detective showed Lincoln photographs with statements on the back which incriminated him. The detective told him his co-conspirators wrote the statements, but the detective wrote them. After the detective told Lincoln his mother implicated him, he confessed. Lincoln's taped confession was admitted at trial, and he was convicted.

On appeal, Lincoln acknowledged police are allowed to use deception during interrogations, but argued the deception went too far with the detective's creation of false documents. The State must prove by a preponderance of evidence that a defendant's confession was voluntary, knowing, and intelligent under the circumstances; the use of police trickery or deceit is one of the factor courts consider in deciding whether a Miranda waiver was valid. The Court of Special Appeals refused to hold that police use of fabricated documents automatically renders a confession involuntary. Instead, the Court continued to take the totality-of-circumstances approach, and ruled that the police-fabricated 'statements' against Lincoln did not overcome his free will in this case. Lincoln v. State, 164 Md.App.170 (2005).

Confessions - police inducement. James Logan was arrested for fatally shooting two Prince George's County sheriff's deputies attempting to serve him with an emergency evaluation petition. A detective talked with Logan for almost an hour, and assured Logan several times that no one would harm him or his family, he would not let anything happen to Logan, he wouldn't use any of the information to harm Logan, and that he and Logan were 'just talking.' Then, while the detective began to advise Logan of his Miranda rights, Logan stated he "always felt kind of comfortable better with a lawyer..." [sic], and said he didn't "want to jeopardize anything." The detective told Logan the "only way this jeopardizes you is if you don't tell the truth." Logan agreed to make a statement without a lawyer. He ultimately confessed to shooting the deputies with the intention of killing them, and was charged with their murders. Logan's pretrial motions challenged the voluntariness of his incriminating statements, but the court found them voluntary. Logan was convicted.

On appeal, Logan argued the long colloquy between Logan and the detective before he was advised of Miranda, coupled with the detective's deception, rendered his statements involuntary. The Court of Special Appeals concluded Logan's confession was involuntary because of the detective's repeated assurances to Logan that 'no harm would come to him,' they were 'just talking,' and 'you are only jeopardized if you don't tell the truth.' These statements directly conflict with Miranda's warning that everything a suspect says can be used against him. The Court pointed out that the harmful effect of the detective's statements could have been cured by, for example, explaining that Logan's statements actually could be used against him. (Note: Although Miranda was violated, the Court held that admitting Logan's incriminating statements at trial was harmless error because Logan did not deny killing the deputies, and used a Not Criminally Responsible defense. The Court ultimately remanded the case for a new trial on other grounds). Logan v. State, 164 Md.App. 1 (2005).

Traffic enforcement.

Section §21-801 of the Transportation Article prohibits driving "at a speed that, with regard to the actual and potential dangers existing, is more than that which is reasonable and prudent under the conditions," and lists conditions requiring drivers to reduce their speed (e.g., railroad crossings, curves, hill crests). Jon Warren was convicted of driving in excess of reasonable and prudent speed under §21-801. Warren appealed his conviction by arguing that, although he exceeded the posted speed limit of 40 mph, §21-801 requires proof of a special condition requiring a reduced speed, and no special condition was proven at trial. The Court of Special Appeals agreed, ruling that "the plain language of §21-801 suggests that the conditions requiring a reduced speed are not those created by driving behavior, but rather are those external conditions to which a driver must react." In other words, the Court interpreted §21-801 as requiring proof of both excessive speed and condition(s) that create an actual or potential danger which should cause drivers to slow down. The Court noted that nighttime darkness is not such a condition. Warren v. State, 164 Md.App. 153 (2005).

Pending in the U.S. Supreme Court. On November 1, the Court heard arguments in a Maryland case about whether police can constitutionally question a suspect who invoked Miranda, but changed his mind after police attempted to re-initiate questioning. State v. Blake, 125 S.Ct. 1823 (2005) (granting cert.).
